Conventional systems for printing characters onto a substrate (e.g., paper, cardboard, or fabric) are known. Such systems may include a printer connected to a personal computer (PC) that prints characters onto the substrate. Conventional printing systems are generally large and bulky. However, the printing of characters using such systems is generally cumbersome. For example, in order to print characters onto a substrate, the characters are typically displayed on a display screen of a PC. In some cases, the printer is positioned above the display screen. Therefore, in order to print characters onto a substrate, a user is required to make the characters in the display screen visible on the display screen of the PC, switch to the PC, then position the characters in the display screen onto a position on the substrate, and position the substrate underneath the PC and printer. Often, a user has to repeat the above process numerous times until the characters printed on the substrate are satisfactory.

Therefore, there is a need for a system and method for printing characters onto a substrate that overcomes the above noted problems. Do the words “WEATHER” and “COLLISION” mean anything to you? - caisahshah I had always been advised that “WEATHER” is a term used by the insurance companies and that even if someone hits you on the road they are “not your insurer”, so I was really surprised to find out that, “COLLISION” is the legal term describing a collision. Am I wrong? ===== crispytx I always hear weather insurance. Weather insurance? What? The National Traffic Safety Administration has a website that explains this [1].
