Reproducibility of prostate-specific antigen level measurements. Prostate-specific antigen (PSA) levels have become a major laboratory tool in the diagnosis and follow-up of patients with prostatic diseases. A number of studies have been carried out to investigate the reproducibility of PSA assays. Two consecutive measurements of PSA, performed in a population of normal subjects and benign hyperplastic subjects, are compared. Despite the wide range of values for the PSA levels in benign hyperplastic subjects, the two measurements showed an excellent correlation. In a second series of patients with benign prostatic hypertrophy and no prostatic disease, the reproducibility was also excellent, despite the wide range of values for the PSA levels. In a third series of patients, a comparison was made between PSA measurements obtained by a modified assay (using HPA-RIA) and PSA measurements obtained by an immunoradiometric assay (using a monoclonal antibody). The two methods, although in use in our laboratory, gave very different PSA values. In a second series of patients, in which the two methods were compared, the results showed a good agreement between the two assays. The results of the study indicate that the two assays give consistent results and that reproducibility is excellent. The values obtained in a series of patients with benign prostatic hypertrophy and with no prostatic disease give a good starting point for PSA levels in the diagnosis of prostatic disease. In a third series of patients, in which the two methods were compared, the results showed a good agreement between the two assays.Q: Google
