Sea urchins of the genus Parastrella are active predators in the oceans of the world. The species Parastrella tepidarum (Hedley, 1902) is one of the most abundant amphipods in southern Antarctic waters. To gain a better understanding of the biology of this species, we conducted a long-term bioassay of P. tepidarum using a commercial algae diet. We observed a positive growth response of P. tepidarum to increasing concentrations of the algae diet during the first four weeks of the experiment. Since algae of the same species did not provide a significant source of nutrition after four weeks of feeding, we conclude that the mortality of P. tepidarum cannot be attributed to a lack of food availability. Furthermore, P. tepidarum was sexually mature, and offspring were produced in the final phase of the experiment. These offspring appeared capable of surviving long periods of time as adults, because P. tepidarum was found in deep water for over one year. Our results suggest that P. tepidarum could complete its life cycle within a single year, but a detailed analysis of the life history of this species is needed to verify this hypothesis. Kaspersky Reset Trial V5.1.0.35 Final.Q: How to get a list or array of all Windows references in a process and its child processes in .Net In one process, using .Net 2.0, I need to get a list of all windows references in the process and in all child processes that it creates. The reason for this is that I am trying to track windows objects at a specific process level and child processes are likely to be in this scenario. Getting a list of windows references is easy: IntPtr hWnd = new IntPtr(Window.Handle); and then looping through the window handles of all child processes that the current process creates is straight forward: foreach (IntPtr h in GetChildWindows(hWnd)) { // Do something } But the problem comes in when I need to check if a windows object belongs to the current process or a child process. I would like to ask the following questions: Is there an easy way in .Net 2.0 to get a list or
